Read the following passage and choose the correct answer

Little lies are so common in our daily lives that we often don't even think of them as lies. For example, many people lie about their age or their child's age to get a cheaper ticket. Others might tell a dinner host that the terrible food was delicious or pretend to love a gift that they actually dislike. These lies are not serious, but they raise an important question: If we lie about small things, could it make us more likely to lie about bigger things in the future?

Lying can sometimes give us an immediate benefit, making us feel good in the moment. However, the future consequences of lies are uncertain. If people get used to lying, they might start doing it more often, even when it is not necessary. Over time, this could affect their relationships and their sense of honesty.

Nevertheless, no one can be completely honest all the time. In fact, lying is often a natural part of social life. Many people lie to protect the feelings of others, and in some cases, this can be a good thing. For example, telling a cook you enjoyed a meal, even if you didn't, can make them feel happy. Similarly, telling a child they played the piano well, even if they didn't, can encourage them to keep practicing. Complimenting a friend's new haircut, even if you don't like it, can boost their confidence and make them feel good about themselves. Sometimes, white lies help avoid unnecessary arguments and maintain peace in relationships. If people were brutally honest all the time, it could hurt others and create tension in social situations. Honesty is usually the best policy, but sometimes, small lies help maintain kindness and harmony in relationships. The key is to know when a lie is harmless and when it can lead to bigger problems.
